

who speak the Wallachian tongue, the remainder of the people speaking German. The Government, at which I was present, seeing that these nations were bound to suppress this revolt. Besides, I should state that one of the chief political adversaries of Metternich, was to oppress one nation by means of another. One army was drawn out of the land, part in Bohemia and part in Italy, while we had in Hungary, Germans, Croats, Poles, and Wallachs. At the head of this revolt was the Ban of Croatia, and they finished by declaring their independence. We, the Hungarian ministers, entreated the King to give his consent to convolve the parliament, in order that means might be obtained to suppress the revolt. The Minister of Hungary nominated by the King, stood beside the Archduke Palatine, when he gave the order. [Hear, hear.]

The King fled to Innsbruck, and a deputation went there, inviting him to come to Buda, and rely on the loyalty of the people. We promised to defend him against the world—and the Hungarians have proved that they can defend what they have promised to defend. [Cheers.] I also stood beside the Archduke Palatine when he read the solemn edict of the King, condemning the machinations of the Croats and Serbs, and stating that he had given orders to his ministers in Hungary to put down the revolt. In the same edict was called upon his faithful Parliament at Hungary, to send an army, and to provide means to carry on the war. It was who proposed to Parliament, but I had hardly said a few words when I was stopped in my speech, and the supplies granted at once.

While these matters were going on, news arrived from Italy that the battle of Constanza had been won, and that the government of Vienna were now in a position to conquer the means of crushing Hungary. A proclamation was issued against Jellachich, who had been proclaimed a traitor by the King, to go against Hungary, calling him a friend. Surely there is not an honest man in the world who will not condemn that. [Hear, hear.] Jellachich came on with 10,000 men, but we beat him, taking two armies and one general, our only force being the undisciplined people armed with scythes. He then asked for a truce, and two days were given him, and in the meantime he broke his word and escaped. We followed him. I was then President of the Council, the ministry having resigned in consequence of the dissolution of Parliament before the arrangement of the budget, which was against the Constitution, which provided that the Parliament should not separate without arranging the budget. In addition to this violation of Constitutional rights, the King makes his aller go, giving to him the power to govern Hungary, of Jellachich, the man whom he had proclaimed as a traitor.

We said we would not take the traitor as governor, and that the parliament could not be dissolved, because it had voted no budget. We declared that the order for dissolution had not been signed by the responsible officer, and that therefore, the Parliament must sit. I had then the honor to be president of the provisional government, and I ordered Jellachich, who had escaped toward Vienna, to be arrested. When he came to the frontiers of Austria, I sent commissioners to the Government, demanding from the General of the Austrian army that they leave out of respect the laws of neutrality towards well-known give any shelter to the revolted. long in it not only protected him, but permitted to join in the operations of the siege of Vienna. These two armies came to Hungary, under Windischgratz, calling us rebels and slaves, as we struggled, and fought his history tells you. [Loud cheers.] But still one thing I must add, that although we were victors, defeated in the Imperial armies in several battles—although the Emperor of Austria had issued a Proclamation on the 4th of March, 1849, in which he gloried on the false report of a general army, that never occurred, he declared by a Europe to each of his pen that the nationality of Hungary was to be torn up, and that henceforth Hungary was to be incorporated with the Austrian Empire, to be ruled by his good will and pleasure notwithstanding all this, I say, still we did not proclaim a rupture with the House of Hapsburg, until I had received certain intelligence that the Russian intervention had been decided upon and accepted. [Hear, hear.] And I am sorry to add, that we also got information as to against this intervention we had no help to expect anywhere. [M. Kosuth was here, deeply affected, and burst into tears.] Then I considered the matter in my conscience, and came to the conclusion that either my nation must submit to overthrow and, to an end of its life without even trying to save ourselves, or, if we were not cowardly and base enough to commit such suicide, some reward was necessary to justify the struggles and sacrifices of the people.

And I proposed that if we were to contend against two great empires—if there was nobody to help us, nobody to prevent Paskewitch, as he had promised, treading on the neck of Hungary—if we were to struggle for our liberties, we had once struggled for the Christian liberties of Europe, then I proposed, as a reward, the independence of Hungary, and my proposal was accepted. [Loud cheers.] That is a statement of what occurred, and you all know what was the result. How we fared let me not say; it is too deep matter for sorrow. This much only I say, that though forsaken by the whole world, I am to this day confident that we would have been a match for the combined forces of the two despotic powers, but it is my fault and my weakness that as Governor of Hungary, having the lead in this great movement, I had not art enough to fight with equal arms the duplicity of Russia, you know how he introduced treason into our councils. Had I only been prepared for this treason, all would not certainly have failed. [Hear, hear.] But the result of what has occurred is, that the House of Hapsburg, as a dynasty, exists no more. It merely vegetates at the whims of the mighty Czar, a laughing-stock to whom it has become the obedient servant. [Hear, hear.] But if the people of England only decided that Russia should not set her foot on the neck of Hungary—if they would only resolve to say "stop," to Russia, and nothing more, we might still be happy. Hungary would have knowledge, patriotism, loyalty, and courage enough to dispose of its own domestic matters, as it is the sovereign right of every nation to do. [Hear, hear.] And now, gentlemen, I trust you will excuse me if I have not answered your expectations—if I have tired you. [No, no.] My intention was to show you that the cause of my country is worthy of your generous sympathy, because we have struggled for a national existence, which, when once lost, there is no resurrection any more for a people. This is the cause for which I ask your generous sympathy, and which I am enabled to lay before you here through the generous hospitality of the Mayor of Southampton.

He has acted the part of a kind and generous friend to one so undeserving as myself. He was a father to the unfortunate, and the protector of the suffering humanity. Happy the realm where such a man can rise from the people by his own perseverance, his own integrity, his own energy. It is the glory of England that such a man rising in such a manner can enjoy the honor and confidence of his countrymen. Let me, then, while expressing my humble and everlasting thanks for the kind sentiments entertained towards me, propose to you, with the deepest affection, the health of the Mayor of Southampton. [Cheers.]
